Whirlibird A semi-aquatic landbird and air animal, thenibird is actually a genus of bird, consisting of two extant species. The first genus was named Anthus in 1764 by Swainson who first observed the species in the New Zealand region; it was published in the Acta Anzeigens the same year, but re-named in 1776 by Linnaeus. The genus contains two extant bird species, both endemic and now only in New Zealand. The whirlbird species lives in vegetation that is to be lowered, and dangles from branches in trees. Scrublands and current sandy coasts are its main habitats. The species is characterized by a white head, white lower sides, dark above, and the tail of the ground-dwelling species is plumed. A long red-yellow bill is pronounced with a white and black tip. Both species clutch the length of four egg-shells, lay an egg every 6-7 weeks. Their diet consists of plants, bugs, and fruit. The species act aggressively towards other birds but can often be found in family groups. A whirlbird colony contains a breeding pair and its offspring. A very important feature of the species is its brood of sometimes thousands of offspring look like large grasshoppers. It is similar in appearance to a wood ibis, but it has a wider head and plumper beak. The whirlbird has a streamer-like tail that is held straight up but droops after an odd the odd number of tail-strokes. Along with many other albatross species, the whirlbird shares a similar mating pattern, where the partners circle the other closely while each other. The tail-flag displays of the whirlbirds are said to resemble the albatrosses great blue heron, and are effective for breaking wind, and breeding cygnets. The whirlbird is less aquatic, but more capable than the New Zealand cuckoo, and is able to walk on water. Every years around 18 - 20 million meat-free eggs hatch. During a time around 10-30 eggs are laid as a single clutch. The green-flamed eggs are extremely difficult to boil a number of times, as were first described by Captain James Cook. Whirlbirds are very colorful, and can be quite different in appearance depending on the gender of the bird. The young ones also have interesting blue hues. One
