The latter, which showed increases in connections in the OFC, the precuneus and the angular gyrus, were more widely distributed compared to the former, which showed increases in connections within the PPC. Intracranial electroencephalography in humans has revealed that the PPC is part of the dorsal attention network (Robinson et al., [B40]), and it has been hypothesized that this function becomes more active during performing a sequential finger tapping task (Berti et al., [B6]). Such a hypothesis is consistent with our finding of increases in resting state activity of the PPC during a sequential finger tapping task. We did not find any significant correlation between the ERSP slope value and performance in the sequential finger tapping task. This result is not surprising, since we analyzed a parameter that only provides information about the speed of sequential finger tapping and it is not a direct index of brain activity. In addition, we analyzed the first half of the recording for ERSP slope values in order to limit the contribution of long-term changes in the performance during the recordings and minimize potential contribution of fatigue effects. Future studies with a longer recording session could provide additional information about the possible relationship between performance and brain function changes. It should be noted, however, that the use of the fixed-effect model in the present study makes it more difficult to compare and interpret results across subjects, since the results of the fixed-effect model are more dependent on the individual characteristics of the subjects analyzed and less representative of the majority of participants. However, the fixed-effect model has been shown to have low type II errors when applied to the investigation of several physiological parameters in resting-state experiments in general (Biswal et al., [2007]; Maris and Oostenveld, [2008]; Biswal et al., [2008]). Accordingly, the model has been applied to other parameters of the brain
