It is known that the concentration of oxygen in various gas streams may be controlled by several means. For example, in vacuum processes such as the filling, drawing and/or coating of glassware or other articles with a vapour phase coating material, as well as in many other processes, it is desirable to reduce the oxygen content in the working gas stream. In order to accomplish this reduction in oxygen concentration, a deoxygenation technique is required. In addition to reducing the concentration of oxygen in the working gas stream, most deoxygenation processes also reduce the concentration of other impurities in the gas stream. Some typical impurities include, for example, carbon dioxide, carbon monoxide, hydrogen, nitrogen, hydrocarbon vapors, and others. Various deoxygenation processes have been proposed, including the use of molecular sieves, for example, see U.S. Pat. No
